

KARSINO10

Have you ever been in one of those situations where time seems to stop, where you have a shift of perception and see something in a whole new light?

As a designer, Louis Krudo has lots of those moments.

You will see it if you are ever in a conversation with him and suddenly his face changes into a concentrated look. He may even grab a piece of random paper or a napkin at a restaurant and begin drawing. Waitresses have been kind enough to share their pen with him if he happens to be pen-less, which isn't often.

This is how KARSINO10 began, as a napkin drawing. Initially, it had a different handle. The handle you see on Krudo's design called STRICK9 was the original KARSINO10 handle.

Once Krudo set the design up in CAD, his wife, Andrea, took one look and said, I like that handle, but with tanto blade...and STRICK9 was born.

Krudo still wanted the blade that he had originally designed to come to life.

Building a new handle design didn't take long. The look of KARSINO10 does not mirror STRICK9, but the two designs are so interwoven that their names had to relate.

Both knife names are consecutively numbered and both connote poisonous substances.
